STANZAS.

A HEBREW MELODY.

Soft winds still blow o'er Jordan's stream, And curl its restless flood, As when along its banks of green The sons of Judah trod.

The stars look down as fair and bright, On hill and plain and stream, As when the Prophet watched at night Their silver shining beam.

STANZAS.

On Carmel's distant waving fields Still creeps the clust'ring vine; And still the rose of Sharon yields Its fragrant sweets divine.

Though winds are soft and stars are bright, O'er distant field and flood, As when the beams of sacred light

Shone round the Ark of God;

No more is heard the Levite's song, No more the Prophet's dream; No more the choral virgin throng On Zion's hill is seen.

The Hebrew maids in Gentile lands Now seek an exile's home; And where their father's grave-stones stand, The sons of Hagar roam.

ě.

There is a flower that never dies;

Its beauties ever bloom;

Among the dead its petals rise,

And cling around the tomb.

When winter's storms are cold and drear,

And fierce the tempests rave,

Its brightest flowerets then appear,

And smile upon the grave.

• The resemary is said to bloom in winter, and is planted around graves and tombs by mourning friends, as an emblem of that love and friendship which live even in death.

I

THE ROSEMARY.

Come, sweetest flower, a wreath I'll twine,To friendship's sacred name;A brighter, holier branch than thine,Not friendship's self can claim.

Like youthful love, thy summer bower A living fragrance brings; Like friendship's tear, thy wintry flower 'Mid cheerless tempests springs.

"Come, fun'ral flower," I'll plant thy root Beneath the cypress shade; And let thy lowly blossoms shoot

Where man's last home is made.

And when, sweet flower, that home is mine,

A living perfume shed;

And kindly o'er the lonely shrine

Thy softest tendrils spread.
