"For all, who, battling through this life,
With anguish steeped, with evil rife,
Faint underneath the unending strife;

Dear for the sorrows they endure,
And dear to pitying God most sure,
Who makes his own by all means pure."

TO THE THIRD EDITION.

It would be difficult to give any account of a book compiled as this has been. Of the original English work, scarcely more than the title and the introductory essay have been retained, while the changes from the first American edition are most radical. It is sent out again simply because our sick rooms need some such visitor. It does not pretend to supply the want, only to stand in the gap until something better shall offer.
