CHAPTER I.

FAREWELL, COZUMEL.

BENEATH the golden roof-tree of a palm, on the sandy shore of Laguna Santa Cruz, lay stretched the figure of a youth within sound of the surf-beat of the blue and sparkling waters of the Caribbean Sea.

It is a land-locked lakelet — Laguna Santa Cruz — on the coast of Cozumel, an island lying east of the mysterious peninsula of Yucatan. Deep and sombre are the woods of Cozumel, containing within their secret depths the ruins of most ancient buildings, pyramids, and perhaps palaces — sole mementos of a people passed away. Spicy and fragrant are the gales that sweep over these forests and drift languidly across to the main land, laden with the sweets of a thousand blossoms, with the perfume of palms, and the honey-scent of frangipanni. For centuries have these honeyed breezes blown the odors of Cozumel over to the silent main, giving to this fair isle its name, "Cozumel, Island of Honey-bees."

The solitary palm that sheltered the motionless form from the sun waved its leaves in the afternoon breeze, sending a flickering play of shadow over the yellow sand beneath, and letting in, now and again, an ardent beam; but even the piercing shaft of Helios failed to move this sleeper on the shore. The cocoa-nuts above clashed noisily together, the dry flower-spathes rustled against the trunk, and the long branches of the palm swayed this way and that with the coming breath of evening; still no movement beneath. Even when a boat-keel grated upon the sand and there leaped out three half-naked men who advanced stealthily upon the slumberer, he stirred not. It seemed then that a quivering shock passed through trunk and
