Foreword

TERY many of those who read this book will be young shareholders in the John Williams-that small ship about which He says to His disciples that it should wait upon Him. There is always and everywhere a welcome at her coming and a God-speed at her going; for she links up many groups of islands in a comradeship of service and goodwill. White missionaries, many, and coloured missionaries, very many more, have watched the stars from her deck. and have counted days to the port for which they were bound as messengers of Jesus: and isolated English men and women have looked eagerly for her coming with news of the land they left, and with supplies for school or home.

Years and years ago a small boy went with his mother, and his "ship-card," to call upon a good old lady. They came away with half-a-crown. It was the first thing he had ever done for the London Missionary Society.

It is that small boy who has written these stories of some of the great men who left England in 1816. He wants you to know that a whole book might have been written about any of them, and that there were others who were just as splendid as these men were. Also, he wants to congratulate you, and, if he may, to thank you all as comrades of his for helping to keep full steam ahead on the good ship John Williams.
