PREFACE.

The following chapters are the outcome of research extending over a period of some years, undertaken as a student of the University of Manchester. The enormous quantity of material hidden away in bookshelves seldom disturbed, has made it difficult to do more than place results before the reader, and the scope of the work has prevented the introduction of much that is interesting and illuminative regarding the eighteenth century in England. An attempt has been made to trace the connection between these pieces of forgotten literature, and to observe the development of a school of thought in English religion which has not always been recognised by students of that period.

I desire to express my sincere thanks to the Librarian of the Dr. Williams' Library, and to his courteous Assistants: to the Rev. T. Crippen of the Memorial Hall Library, London, and to others who by valuable information supplied through correspondence have assisted in various ways. My warmest thanks are due to Professor Tout, whose sympathy has been much appreciated, and to the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., who has crowned all his previous acts of kindness by preparing the Index.

To those who know the complicated story which
