CONTENTS.

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. How a poor Ohio boy heard of a great fortune awaiting him in Massachusetts	9
II. The prospect of sudden wealth causes a very pretty family quarrel	16
III. Andrew sets off in search of his fortune	23
IV. A club flung into a chestnut tree produces surprising results	28
V. The skinny little old man gives our hero an important piece of information	31
VI. How Andrew was welcomed and entertained at the Pettridge mansion	33
VII. Andrew makes acquaintance with the baker's daughter, and learns more of the strange old man	44
VIII. Mr. Pettridge has a death-bed secret to impart to his nephew, but concludes not to die	52
IX. The strange situation in which Andrew read over again his mother's letter	59
X. How it chanced that the baker's wife carried a broth to the old miser	66
XI. The baker's daughter pays the "ridiculous tall boy" a compliment, and shows him how to wash windows	73
XII. Introduces Andrew, and the reader, to some not very agreeable new acquaintances	79
XIII. In which Miser Nathan produces some of his magic money	85
XIV. The baker, the bakery, and the baker's small assistant	91
XV. How Andrew, in a very humble way, obtained employment	97

XXVI.	Why the Burge boys broke into and ransacked Old Nathan's house in his absence . . .	102
XVII.	In which, by a rare chance, Andrew enjoys a sight of more of the old man's money . . .	109
XVIII.	How Lem Gorbett stepped down from the baker's wagon, while his successor stepped up	115
XIX.	One horse in Andrew's care loses flesh mysteriously; and another, for a like inscrutable cause, runs away with his pies and cakes	120
XX.	What our hero carried home in his pockets from one of his trips, and what happened to him in the darkened stable	127
XXI.	Showing how hard it may sometimes be for an innocent person to make his innocence appear	133
XXII.	Andrew takes a holiday and experiences the novel sensation of seeing his name in print,	140
XXIII.	Old Nathan eats chestnuts again, with results of very great importance to himself and his nephew.	147
XXIV.	Our hero takes his final departure from the old house, and sets off on a dubious adventure	152
XXV.	Traces a curious connection between Lem Gorbett's coat cuff and Andrew Hapnell's pocket	158
XXVI.	The clearing up of one mystery lets in unexpected side-lights upon two others	165
XXVII.	In which the most important mystery of all receives a startling solution	171
XXVIII.	Andrew relates his adventure with the cane to a highly interested audience	178
XXIX.	He is favored with some practical advice by the friendly baker, but obstinately follows the counsel of a very different monitor	183
XXX.	Which is short and likewise conclusive	189
