TALES FROM THE CLASSICS.

Annihilation of Carthage.

1.

Out, Cato! Cato! great as is thy name. For one fell act thou 'rt cursed for e'er to fame,--Thy fiend-like counsel, urging to destroy Rome's rival, Carthage, in her pride and joy. Too fully was thy mind resolved on this :--" Proud Carthage shall be made a wilderness ;" Ay! though she have been mistress of the main, Of Sieily, Sardinia, and Spain. And now the occurrences we will relate That stamp'd the seal to her lamented fate, And show that if there were a " Punic-faith," It had a parallel in Roman wrath.

11.

The Romans, having form'd the base resolve The City's demolition to involve, Albeit no cause could justify the act, Dissimulated with their usual tact.

ANNIHILATION OF CARTHAGE.

Rome first demanded its submission; then, Three thousand scious of the noblest men, As hostages; and, when deliver'd, she Demanded next, Carthage should put away All arms and hostile implements of war Which Carthage and its cities near and far Contain'd,—as forfeited to Rome. Was this (Which was its safeguard—that its only bliss) Demand complied with? Ay! I grieve to say, Two hundred thousand armour-suits that day, And thirty hundred engines with their frames, Relinquish'd were,—or offer'd to the flames.

III.

Next, Rome demanded Carthage hence should leave Her name alone, the Romans to deceive; That all inhabitants, what sex or sort, Should quit their city—suburbs, walls, and fort; And elsewhere raise a Carthage, as they chose, For that which fate decreed they were to lose; And eighty stadia from the sea were they To keep the bound'ry of its walls away.

IV.

And now the Carthaginians, at last, Discover'd how their doom had been forecast; That Roman jealousy would not endure So vast a rival, 'though on distant shore; And heeded but as nought the sacrifice They'd made already to rotain their prize. And sith that all must leave their habitation At the demand of that all-haughty nation,
