PREFACE.

THE following Poems, on various subjects, were written from time to time, without any view to publication.

As they appeared to be the utterance of the heart—the expression of fancy, in simple and unaffected language—they were deemed not unworthy of being collected and preserved.

Those who may have leisure to read such writing, in this age of utility, may find something in unison with their own feelings, which may soothe and elevate the mind, and afford the melancholy pleasure of knowing that others have thought and felt as they have—their fellow-sufferers—

“Who, being with feelings fine endued,
Feel doubly all their woes.”

If such should happily be the case, the Editor will not be altogether without his reward.

LOTA, DALKEY, December, 1856.
