TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE edition of this work published in 1850 has become exhausted, and the existing demand for it is such as to warrant its republication. The translator undertook the work primarily to supply a need which he felt for a text-book adapted to the more advanced class of students, and he has been encouraged to learn that other teachers have found the same adaptedness in it. The opportunity, afforded by a reprint, has been embraced, to attempt to explain and illustrate the leading position of the treatise, in an Introductory Essay, as well as to throw some more light upon the general subject of Rhetoric and Eloquence. The series of Questions, which has also been appended to this edition, will serve, it is hoped, to generalize the contents for the student, and thereby to assist him in getting possession of them. The work is again committed to the public, with the confident belief that its influence, wherever felt, will be truthful and salutary.
