TO THE READER.

IT is a natural presumption on the part of the reader of this argument, that its preparation was prompted by the recent wonderful developments which have signalized the history of Europe.

So far from that, the whole argument, excepting the tenth chapter, and the note to the eighth, was in manuscript, with the design of immediate publication, near four years ago.

Some may think they discover a discrepancy of one or two years, between the time when certain events ought to have occurred, according to my system, and their actual occurrence. The writer admits no such discrepancy, beyond that resulting from probable errors in certain ancient chronological eras.

The fixing dates to the fulfillment of Daniel's prophecy, has become a somewhat unpopular enterprise. In the commencement of this argument, the writer had no premeditated design of placing
